(local or network) Windows Live has announced the release of Windows Live Search, which is a search utility embedded in Windows XP and Windows Vista that users can use to search for information and services on the Web. Microsoft will give the software to users for free. There is also a trial version. This is a game changer for Microsoft. It will go a long way towards giving Windows Live a formidable position in the market. It has been long overdue for Microsoft to get into search, as it is currently losing the comparison battle with Yahoo! and Google. Users can search the Web for anything, including news articles, information, games, and a host of other categories. Once the software is installed, all searches are done through Windows Live Search. To use it, simply enter the search query on the search box, and search. In a press release, Microsoft said, “Search will easily find information for a wide range of interests such as news headlines, top stories, technology help, popular blogs and forums, sports results, stock information, product and service recommendations, and product reviews,” (PCWorld.com). Apart from free, an ad-supported version is also available.
