We spoke with one researcher who doesn't. He says all that prestige and well-publicized work is about as credible as a paid astrologer. Known as Stephen Novella, he's a science guy who is becoming an expert on pseudoscience and health. He writes for several Web sites and makes his own videos. In his view, much of what passes for science is just another form of dodgy pseudoscience. You can hear his thoughts on the importance of asking good questions, on the problem with popularizing science, and how to get the real thing for free at the following links: Kaku: Listen, I do this all the time. I find that people will believe anything as long as you give them enough of a sense of validation that their suspicions were right. Novella: What you have to understand is, everybody knows what science is. Every priest and every preacher in the world knows what science is. It's what makes sense. What makes sense is usually the most likely explanation. It's hard to beat that, for

System Requirements:

You will need at least a Pentium 4 1.6Ghz, and you'll want a SATA II hard drive or SSD (depending on which one you choose).
System Requirements: There is no model limit, but your budget is the determining factor for what CPU you will choose. I wouldn't recommend anything lower than an Intel Core 2 Duo E8400, and only recommend
