Colonic perforation is a complication of colonoscopy that can lead to morbidity and mortality. However, little is known about risk factors associated with this complication. We aimed to identify risk factors for colonic perforation during colonoscopy. This study was a retrospective cohort study. A total of 10,127 patients who underwent colonoscopy between October 2006 and August 2011 were studied. Colon perforation during colonoscopy occurred in 50 patients (0.48%). We compared patients with perforation (n = 50) with those who did not experience perforation (n = 9,947). Baseline characteristics, procedure-related parameters, and co-morbid conditions were analyzed using multivariable logistic regression to assess their association with perforation. During colonoscopy, the median patient age was 62 years. Perforation occurred significantly more often during right-sided colonoscopy (44.0%) than during left-sided colonoscopy (26.8%) (P = 0.03). The rate of perforation was the highest during extracorporeal shockwave lithotripsy (2.2% per colonoscopy). Perforation was significantly associated with longer durations of procedure and the use of a mechanical lithotripter (P = 0.002). After adjusting for other factors, patient age, sex, diabetes, and previous Individuals' attitudes toward older people and their wishes for a care recipient: an Italian case study. The study investigated the attitudes that older Italians have toward their relatives in terms of characteristics and needs and the wishes that they would have for a care recipient. A multi-stage random sample of 659 people aged 18-83 years was obtained by means of a telephone questionnaire. The sample consisted of the participants of the L'IAFIS (Integrated Elderly in Family and Society), a randomized controlled study in which the psychoeducational programme, 'L'IAFIS', aimed at the promotion and prevention of depression in frail elderly people. The sample was subdivided into younger (group 1: 20-60 years), middle-aged (group 2: 61-80 years) and older (group 3: 81-93 years) subgroups. Variations were evident in the three subgroups in terms of attitudes toward their relatives. Older people revealed more positive attitudes about their relatives than younger participants. Participants within the same group did not hold the same views, suggesting that, in addition to a general trend, attitudes were specific to the person. The findings of the study could be taken into account when designing educational programmes intended to promote good intergenerational relations and to inform the needs of the care-receiver. Q: How do I add a class to the page title? I would like to add a class to a string and output it to the page title. I tried this: But it doesn't seem to work. Is this possible? A: You must be using PHP 5.4.0+. Instead, you should use PHP's `get_class()` function, e.g., See also this manual note: Note that class names are always considered in a case-insensitive manner.
