While using a browser for the first time is a pleasant experience, it is also necessary to remember some of the settings you made, especially for the most sensitive of applications like the browser. With so many browsers to choose from, it is not easy to remember which applications and plugins you downloaded, the browser versions you have installed, and which browser-based preferences should be set and which should remain as it is. However, the process is not very difficult if you follow the right steps. So, let us show you how to use the basic features of the browser for the first time, and the steps you can follow to save your data and get the best experience from your browser of choice. Uninstall and reinstall the browser The first step is to uninstall your browser, and restart your computer for a fresh start. Once that is done, you will see that your homepage in the browser is changed to your browser's support page. If you don't want to see this page, you can go to the browser's settings by clicking on the small box icon in the lower-right corner of your browser's window. This will open up a number of options, including the browser's home page, as well as some of the most popular plugins and extensions in your browser. Read more: Turn off browser extensions The important thing to remember here is to not simply check "Keep the current homepage" or "Keep the current plugins and extensions", and instead, choose to make your new browser page the homepage. This will make it so that you do not have to use the browser's options to change the settings of the application to make the browser your homepage. Create your home page Once you have removed the browser from your computer and rebooted it, it is time to make your home page. To create a new one, you will need to use the browser's settings by clicking on the small box icon in the lower-right corner of your browser's
