Q: Use bash while loop with nohup to run job I am trying to run a job that will check some data in one minute intervals. I can't seem to get a while loop to execute in a way that both works and is safe. The following code will periodically report to the console that it was still running: while :: do if [ "$(pgrep -x $job)" ]; then echo "Still running" fi sleep 60 done I would like to get the job to shutdown properly if it were interrupted. When I try to accomplish this with a timeout, the script does not execute a nohup as expected. try [ echo "Not running" while :: do if [ "$(pgrep -x $job)" ]; then echo "Still running" fi sleep 60 done & ] catch [ echo "Not running" ] If nohup is passed, the command will complete properly and the job will be stopped. However, this obviously is not what I want. Can someone suggest an elegant, safe way to prevent interrupting the job while still allowing the script to check it periodically? A: The classic way to do this is to call the job as another child of your script. For example: $ ps ax | grep $(pgrep -x $job) PID TTY TIME STAT CMD 4796?
