Google offers the popular Gmail service to its users, and it offers another email service called Inbox. Inbox is a desktop-only feature, so it's not yet available on Android or iOS. However, this means that Gmail accounts can now be accessed through the Inbox web interface. Inbox claims that it shows your important emails more clearly, filters out spam emails, and learns from your actions and habits. Meanwhile, Inbox for Gmail is basically just a web-based version of your Gmail. Users can download a web browser, open their inbox, log in using their Google credentials, and access messages, attachments, and more. Inbox allows you to create new filters for your inbox, see the history, the date of sending, the senders, the servers, and even the content of emails, all of which is handy when it comes to keeping track of your emails on the go. Inbox is more than a social inbox, since it keeps track of your chats, tasks, and even saves your reading history – so you can return to the places you left off. Inbox runs on all major browsers, so whether you use Firefox, Safari, or Chrome, you can access your Inbox account. Your local Android or iOS devices are already compatible with Inbox, but there's a catch. Inbox is currently only available to users in Canada, the UK, France, and Germany. There's also no word on whether Google plans to bring Inbox to the US, but you may be able to access your Inbox account when you travel. Like most other Google services, you
