It's also available for iOS, Android, and the web. Photoshop has over 100 million users, and one of the fastest-growing software markets since its release in 1993. This tutorial covers the basics of Photoshop and demonstrates how to create the most basic of design elements. Photoshop has been praised for its capabilities and for its accessibility. It is the successor to an older picture editor, MacPaint. Photoshop was released for both Mac and Windows with the Mac version operating at a higher level of quality. Today, most of us use Photoshop on Windows rather than on a Mac. It is cross-platform, and Windows and Macintosh users can easily share files and work on projects side by side. Figure 1. Photoshop is an extremely powerful image editor, just as the name suggests. It also has a lot of features related to graphics and it's primarily used for creating graphics. It supports many file types and formats and most of the files you'd need in graphics designing. A digital photo editor like Photoshop would be capable of handling all the formats Photoshop can handle. It comes with Adobe Creative Suite. There are a lot of features which make Photoshop a power tool for creating digital graphics. We'll share some of the most useful feature of Photoshop that you might not know about. HDR HDR HDR (high dynamic range) is the process of balancing exposure to capture all the details of a scene and lose the details of the subject's flesh. The more light you add to a scene, the brighter the subject gets. This can be avoided by adding fewer light exposures. This could create a really cool, detailed image. But it can also turn your subject into a cartoon. The images below show the effect of HDR. HDR is a feature that depends on your camera or phone's dynamic range and is performed automatically. There is a display for the HDR images, where you can view the original image in the top half. The bottom half shows the HDR image with the blown-out highlights and shadows. Manual HDR Photoshop Elements also offers manual HDR. We'll be using the manual HDR option for making the screenshots below. You can move the slider to get the proper exposure. You can also select the boxes to modify the highlight and shadow tones. This is how you can control the highlight and shadow tones manually. One other key point is that you should try not to use an HDR-oriented camera. If you're using a camera that automatically makes the HDR image, it's best to leave the shutter speed and aperture untouched. You will get better results if you shoot a few shots, normally a bracketing sequence of 5 to 10 exposures, and blend them after shooting. Final image with HDR applied. Alternative to Photoshop Photoshop is an extremely powerful graphics editor that has a lot of features. There are alternatives to Photoshop that are less powerful but also offer enough features for small scale graphics. These tools are often available on your Windows PC. Some of the popular choices would be Paint.NET, GIMP (GNU Image Manipulation Program) and Paintbox. All these programs are free for use, 05a79cccff

Q: Adding common (internal) domain to new Azure Website I'm new to Azure and I created a new website in which I need to add common (internal) domain and verify if it's working. First thing I did is creating new domain for it which I gave it as the DNS prefix and selected records type: A record. This works perfectly and I got the following DNS record. After this I created a A record with the value of this DNS record to a new zone with following settings: This also works just fine. Next step is trying to add the common (internal) domain to this website. I created an A record and specified its value as the public DNS of this website and I get the following message: After a lot of looking around I found that this could be a problem with the website's web.config file and I tried to replace the current web.config file and tried to add the A record again. Same result. I also tried to set the DNS record with value: * on all DNS records (including SRV records) and I get the following error: I'm not sure what is the problem and what's the solution to it. A: As your website's default domain is domainname.azurewebsites.net, and your local website's DNS name is test, you need to add a A record for the A record of Azure, not a CNAME record. Azure's API or official portal should help you. Thirty-five years ago today, a killer whale named Gray took his last breath -- the first of his kind to die in captivity at the end of an incredible life as wild as can be. The whale was captured off the West coast of the U.S. and had spent his days in captivity in Sea World from birth. He lived to 21, a wild-looking adult male. Gray was eventually released into the Pacific Ocean, where he swam with his pod for a little more than a year. But in July 1980, he was attacked and killed by fellow orcas. For years, his death was a mystery. Orcas are known for hunting and killing dolphins. And why would they bother killing a whale? At the time, there was little research into killer whales, nor did trainers know how to work with them in captivity, so there were many questions. Thanks to the efforts of the late Dr. Robert Ballard, who became the first American to explore the depths of the ocean and discovered the world's largest structures, the first killer whales were discovered. He found two orcas in 1979 and 1980 in the waters of the Pacific Northwest. As a result, the first completed study of killer whale behavior and communication was published, in 1984, and these studies led to the captive breeding of two killer whales -- an orca named Corky, who was born in July 1985, and an orca named Gabriela, who was born in July 1986. These two orcas, along with the others who lived in the wild, are the real-life embodiments of what we know about orcas today. Gray was the first captive-born orca, but he wasn't alone. During the summer of 1987, three female orcas were born. The fifth and sixth orcas were born the next year. In 1990, a female orca named Friday was found in the wild off the coast of Japan, and in 1992 a female orca named Amanda was born in captivity. A decade later, in 2002, a baby orca born to Corky and a dolphin named Orky was found. The next killer whales born into captivity -- were born in captivity -- are the orcas now known as Mako and Aurora. In 2006, a female orca named Kand
