Anti-tumor necrosis factor (TNF) therapy is increasingly used in inflammatory bowel disease. However, it is not clear to what extent the use of anti-TNF therapy in Crohn's disease in Sweden is associated with reductions in the prevalence of tumors. The aim of this study was to assess the prevalence of tumors and the occurrence of severe inflammatory bowel disease among patients exposed to anti-TNF therapy in a population-based cohort. The Swedish patient registry, the National Patient Register, was used to identify IBD patients starting on anti-TNF therapy between 2000 and 2007. The incidence of IBD was assessed in a cohort of 2,563,854 persons registered in the National Patient Registry during the study period. The prevalence of tumors among patients starting anti-TNF therapy was compared with that of a cohort of 2,563,854 individuals matched for age, sex, and county of residence. The incidence of severe inflammatory bowel disease was compared between exposed and unexposed individuals. The prevalence of tumors in patients with inflammatory bowel disease was not increased among patients exposed to anti-TNF therapy compared with the general population.
