"The initial project with [FIFA Lead Game Designer] Eric Chahi was to look at gameplay and how the physics of the game should be, but the idea started there," said Artificial Intelligence Lead Game Designer Kazunori Yamauchi. "We had used motion capture suits [on the FIFA team] in the past and those suits are used in a way that shouldn't be used, to make the character in the game react to the motion of the player. We wanted to recreate that in a way that doesn't affect gameplay. We wanted to preserve player behavior, so we had to modify the original concept." "We do this to make the game playable when you take elements such as speed, strength and technology into consideration," he said. "We didn't want the game to be too unrealistic because we wanted to preserve player behavior, so to fit in that balance, we adjusted the number of players, density of the players on the field and the space they have. It's a little bit more realistic because players don't run around everywhere now. We kept the density of players on the field the same as past editions, but we compressed it, so there's a little more space on the field. It's not 50 meters. There's a bit more of a realistic format, but there's also a bit of a strategic element, so there's a bit more space for people to play with." "We were always thinking about what the game needs to be balanced and what we needed to be able to achieve this game," said Yamauchi. "We were told that [real-life players] have about 90 meters [in motion capture suits], but in the real match, the player isn't running everywhere. That was a gap we needed to narrow and the reason we have this gap is because [real-life players] make a lot of contact. We needed to create different tactics for a game like this." "As we looked at all the player behaviors, we ended up with four goals. There are people who want to have tactics where they can completely control [the ball], and then there's a complete different style of play where the game is completely reactive to you," he said. "That's where we created all the different game styles."
