Because it appears that they may be per-user settings, the web server or application shouldn't have any knowledge about which client is accessing it. So I have a "device folder" which contains files that are accessible to all my iOS devices. I have already read this question about how to create a symlink. I also found this question where the php-solution was copied into a Swift project to create a new symlink, but that isn't supported by Swift. The solution is there, but not in my project. Another approach would be to give the web server access to a folder on the device where settings can be shared. It's available as a symlink. The problem is that I only know how to open devices, not how to open them with an app. If I click on the network symbol, I get the following dialog: Is there a device manager in Mac that can open devices? Or should I try Apple's developer program or something? A: I think your "device folder" will work just fine. The website you want to let the user view is a web app and it doesn't care about your device folders. Apple no longer allows users to have direct access to files on iPhones, iPads, and iPods. Instead, they have to use the mobile app or an app in the Mac App Store to view the files. Q: Silverlight DataGrid with RowDetailsTemplate How do you do databinding with your RowDetailsTemplate?
