Falling in love with India was never the second coming of a millennial—at least that's what I used to believe—but, with the rising popularity of Bollywood, that's exactly what's happening. I, meanwhile, am at the beginning of a much longer journey to India. A journey that I've been hankering for. The long one. When I was in my late teens, my parents would sometimes take our family on holiday to Australia. Growing up, I would watch with envy at all the Indian kids in the hostel. They had so much energy, knowing exactly how to make you laugh, even when you were feeling like you needed to cry. I thought they were magic. At the time, I knew very little about India. I had just seen the movie Slumdog Millionaire. Of course, it must be a fairytale. I couldn't picture the real India. I remember first travelling to India with my parents in my 20s. It was my first, and only, true escape from adulthood. I remember being exhausted when I finally arrived, but so happy to be released from the responsibilities of responsibility. I remember going to the beach, shivering in my thin T-shirt, wondering what I'd do to pass the time. I remember being drenched in the afternoon sun. I remember running into the water. I remember getting caught in a surprise "lakshman rekha" (literally "wall of love"—the line that prevents you from falling over the edge), from a yoga instructor I'd met in the hostel. I remember being overtaken by a mob when we left the beach, trying to get the details of our hostel, but failing to process them. I remember watching Indian kids playing cricket, wondering how they caught the ball, and why a tennis ball was called a "biryani". I remember learning how to ride a bike. I remember shaving my legs for the first time. I remember the cherry pie that I ate for dessert, and thinking I liked it. (I didn't. It was way too sweet for me.) I remember seeing the Taj Mahal, losing my way, talking to two gorgeous men, and feeling the unmistakeable rush of a new, crazy world. Journeys are two things—a good thing and a bad thing.
