Adobe Photoshop CS6 by Damon Woods The Current State of Photoshop Most people use Photoshop CS6 but have yet to master all the features. I think it's safe to say that most have used Photoshop and know how to use it, and even more have used it to do work for clients. But still many people have never fully developed their skill in the use of Photoshop, only learning the parts they needed for their current projects. In the last few years, there have been a lot of new features added in to assist the user with creating some of the most complex projects. Many people have gotten comfortable with using the program and are performing their jobs well, but they just haven't found the best way to use Photoshop to accomplish projects that require a very high level of skill. Photoshop has always been a great tool for those who want to make images that look professionally created. But now with more advanced tools and features, it is possible to easily create images that no one would believe aren't professional in appearance. Which is better to use...PS or GIMP? As a relatively new user to Photoshop, I first started using Photoshop because it is free, open source, and easily available. I wasn't sure how well it would hold up with a lot of usage, but I went for it.

When I started using Photoshop, my skill level was fairly basic. I had only basic knowledge of using raster images, so I used GIMP to get me started and learn that skillset. I haven't regretted using Photoshop at all, and I now feel like I know all of Photoshop's intricacies quite well. GIMP was great at the time and helped me get my feet wet with a lot of things I needed to accomplish. Photoshop is definitely a more advanced tool. It's more suited for serious professionals, whereas GIMP is great for the beginner or someone who wants to use some visual concepts but doesn't want to deal with all the computer stuff. It's a common misconception that Photoshop and GIMP both do the same thing, and you can use either one to make an image. But these two are very different programs and have very different functions. GIMP has a similar layer-based editing system, and it's very powerful. If you want to learn GIMP more, you can click this link to see how to use GIMP as a basic editing tool. Photoshop

Ask HN: Transparency in SaaS provider - karam20 I would love to see a number of different indicators from all the providers I buy from...the number of total customers and the number of paying customers, perhaps the percentage of customers that had issues with the service and the percentage of returns. I think it could be very useful to the end user. A bit of a follow up question: I also want to see this from an ROI point of view, to see what are the real benefits gained from such information? ===== nickelberry In my experience, the one thing that's often best is the service itself. Do you feel like you need more information to make a decision? If not, then that's a good indication of how well you're being served. Does the service offer the features you need and are they well-designed? Is there a good support team, and do they answer quickly and clearly? On the opposite end, if you get a ton of customer support calls or issues don't get addressed very well, that's a pretty good indicator of why you're buying from that provider. ----- pclark awesome, but I'd be interested to see how this is going.
