Microsoft Toolkit 7.0.2 Portable. Then you are good to go. Now you can download the cracked software, and at the. In the past, it was very difficult to obtain high purity silver for use in making electrical conductor and other commercial products. The bulk of the bulk silver produced from the silver-bearing ore deposits came from elemental silver, that is, as the ore deposits contained the silver, there was no carbon with which to alloy the silver. However, when silver bearing ore is smelted and electrolytically refined, there are many impurities which inherently form in the electrolytic process, and which are coated on the surfaces of the silver particles. As a result, it is now possible to obtain silver having less than 1 part per million of carbon. It has also been known that silver can be coated on a carbonaceous carrier. However, the art has recognized that the silver-coated carrier is unsatisfactory in that the carrier has a relatively short life. Accordingly, the art has not recognized that a silver-coated carrier having a long life can be prepared by precipitating silver from the surface of a carbonaceous material. It is also known in the art that silver and/or gold can be precipitated from silver nitrate, silver chloride, and other silver containing solutions. Typically, gold chloride and silver chloride solutions are used because the gold precipitate is easily separable from the mother liquor. It was also discovered that copper is a significant inhibitor to the deposition of the silver on the carbonaceous material. Accordingly, it has been the practice of the art that a copper compound is added to the solution containing the carbonaceous material and the silver ions in order to prevent the deposition of copper on the carrier. However, the practice of the art has been less than completely satisfactory. The current known process for forming silver-carbon carrier is comprised of the steps of: a) providing a solution of a silver bearing ore, b) precipitating silver from the solution of step (a), c) recovering silver from the mother liquor of step (b), d) coating the silver recovered from step (c) on a carbonaceous material, and e) recovering a product comprising silver coated carbonaceous material. It is an object of the present invention to provide a method for recovering copper from waste streams and utilizing the same in a process for the recovery of precious metals from silver bearing ores. It is another object of the present invention to provide a method for producing a silver-carbon carrier having e79caf774b
