Thermodynamic and kinetic considerations of hexachlorobenzene degradation. The thermodynamics of hexachlorobenzene (HCB) degradation has been examined. The reactions are typically simple: 2- and 4-oxo compounds are converted to dichlorophenols, which in turn are reductively dehalogenated to metabolites such as dichloroanilines and chlorocatechols. A series of steps is hypothesized to account for the ultimate degradation pathway to nontoxic metabolites, including thermochemical inactivation of enzymes. Inactivation of HCB by HCB-decomposing enzymes is examined in relation to the assumed reaction steps. In addition, the effect of complexation with humic materials was investigated. The apparent activities of HCB-decomposing enzymes were determined by using species specific inhibitors, and the relative binding affinities of these inhibitors were determined by using solid-phase microextraction and gas chromatography-mass spectrometry. The data were used to propose a reaction scheme for degradation of HCB. The overall second-order rate constants of the reactions were determined using a thermochemical activation model.

Q: The mechanism of the pre-register process during MCU startup In an effort to learn more about MCUs, I am looking into the pre-register process of the MCU startup. I understand most of it, but I have one question that I don't understand. Specifically, I don't understand the exact role of the instruction PRE-REGISTER. To my understanding, it is just a pointer to the start of the pre-registers area. But then why is the load-time offset of the pre-register area given as part of the instruction. Here is an excerpt from AVR-AVR jump table assembly program:
