What's New in the?

PROJECT SUMMARY: Oncogenic MYC is a transcription factor that has a cardinal role in both cellular transformation and in many forms of human cancer. As such, there is significant interest in understanding how MYC regulates gene expression to mediate its oncogenic effects. MYC transcriptional regulation is complex, and significant insight has been gained into MYC's role in regulating gene expression in response to both intrinsic and extrinsic cues. Yet, much less is known about the mechanisms by which MYC regulates alternative splicing, an increasingly recognized mechanism of gene regulation that occurs post-transcriptionally. Understanding MYC's role in controlling alternative splicing would shed light on how MYC functions in growth and differentiation, and provide a more comprehensive understanding of the molecular and cellular mechanisms underlying MYC-driven cancers. Recent work indicates that MYC promotes the biogenesis of spliceosomal small nuclear ribonucleoproteins (snRNPs) and alters the composition of snRNPs, suggesting that MYC acts by modulating the spliceosome to create a specific RNA splicing environment. The overall goal of this proposal is to determine the molecular mechanisms by which MYC promotes the biogenesis of snRNPs, both in vitro and in vivo. If successful, these experiments will shed light on how MYC promotes the development of cancers with a MYC- amplicon. Importantly, several human tumors are characterized by the presence of MYC-amplicons, and the hallmark features of these cancers are increased growth and decreased apoptosis. Thus, this study is expected to have significant clinical implications and will uncover mechanisms by which MYC promotes tumor growth and development.
