Trench isolation structures are widely used in semiconductor integrated circuit (IC) devices to isolate semiconductor devices and the like. In a conventional method of forming trench isolation structures, a semiconductor substrate is first preprocessed to form trenches. A silicon dioxide (SiO2) insulating layer is then deposited on the surface of the substrate, and the trenches are filled with the SiO2 insulating layer by means of chemical vapor deposition (CVD). The upper surfaces of the SiO2 insulating layer are then planarized using chemical mechanical polishing (CMP), and the remaining insulating layer is then used to form the trench isolation structures. As device dimensions continue to shrink, however, the aspect ratio of the trench isolation structures continues to increase. For example, the aspect ratios of the trenches formed in the semiconductor substrate can approach 1:1. As a result, voids are formed at the bottom of the trenches, and the top surfaces of the SiO2 insulating layer become more and more uneven. In particular, when the trenches are deep and narrow, the effect of the narrow width of the trenches on the aspect ratio is more significant. As a result, the top surfaces of the SiO2 insulating layer become much more uneven. In addition, the CVD layer is often formed from tetra-ethyl-ortho-silicate (TEOS) or the like, which has a high deposition temperature and tends to be readily damaged by high temperatures during the subsequent CMP step.
