(I am using C++11 and have not found any similar questions anywhere.) I want to use any in a function that accepts an unknown number of parameters of a type derived from a certain class. Is it possible to use any with compile-time checking and no need to know the template class/traits? For example, given a class Base, which is a wrapper of some other type, Foo: class Base { public: //... }; I want to be able to create derived classes that are objects, template class MyClass { public: MyClass(T val) : val_(val) {} private: Base val_; }; , and call a function f: template void f(Args &&... args) { using Base = typename std::decay>::type; using MyClass = typename std::decay::type; MyClass myObject(std::forward(args)...); } In other words, it is not known what is in myObject at compile-time, but I want to use any here to allow it to accept any type of Base. I can use inheritance to achieve this: template class MyClass : public Base { public: using Base::Base; using Base::val_; MyClass(Base &&val) : Base(std::forward(val)) {} }; But I don't think this helps. I have to know at compile-time exactly what types derived from Base are legal,
