A: You can use a JRE instead. I installed openjdk 7. And it can read and write to ZIP archives. I didn't test other formats. In the properties->details page, I set the working directory to the archive that you extract. Go to the JRE home directory. Then create a subdirectory of your choice for your user directory, and in there, create a bin folder. Then create a directory with the name "zip". In the bin folder, create a file with the name "unz.exe", and put it in your JRE home directory. Change the permission of the file: chmod +x unz.exe In order to use the file, you have to point to the file in your script or command line with a full path. There is a paucity of studies that have actually observed the types of vocalizations (i.e., inflections) that infants produce. Therefore, the present study was designed to ascertain whether human infants produce specific subsets of vocalizations and to what extent they discriminate between the different subsets. Thirty-four first-time mothers and their infants were observed at 6, 8, and 9 months of age. All sounds were recorded from them using a sound acquisition system. A total of 1,321 vocalizations were recorded. The infant's affect was also assessed at the same times using the Infant Behavior Questionnaire. Results revealed that infants produced at least seven different subsets of sounds, including high-frequency, low-frequency, and infant-directed vocalizations. The use of maternal vocalizations was also observed. There were no significant differences between the three modes of infant-directed vocalizations with regard to mothers' ratings of affect. However, the frequency of infant-directed versus neutral speech was associated with a greater change in negative affect for mothers of older infants. The vocalizations were also found to be shared among the infants. Finally, no direct relationship was detected between the mother's experience in maternal and infant vocalizations and the infants' affect at 8 and 9 months of age.%YAML 1.1 %TAG!u! tag:unity3d.com,2011: ---!u!11
