Free social networking android epub.Climate change risks need to be balanced against the benefits of coal, the UK's ambassador to the EU has said, amid warnings from international bodies about the need for decisive action. The comments from Sir Ivan Rogers in Brussels signal a possible shift in official UK thinking on a controversial subject which has divided politicians, scientists and businesses in the UK and Europe. For weeks a fierce turf war has been unfolding between Tory and Labour politicians. Both sides of the divide are anxious to make the case for what they claim is a clean energy future for Britain that avoids dangerous levels of global warming - or, at least, have a cost-effective low-carbon policy on offer. But with economic and political realities on the ground, the time for compromise on the issue has run out. Fears about the climate have been reinforced in the past 24 hours by the International Energy Agency (IEA), which warned that the world is fast running out of time to keep below 2C of global warming. A report by the agency said that "noise" of events such as
