But he's also as vanilla as techbros get: an effeminate, clueless dork who is obsessed with computer games, old-school hip-hop, and playing Grand Theft Auto. There is no one in the world whose preferred mode of gender expression is "a man who likes to make women laugh." The protagonist of "Zero Punctuation," meanwhile, lives in a world entirely devoid of mood. He goes on and on about his life, his family, the game reviews he's written, the hard drives he's upgraded, the girls he's wooed, and the weather, over a backdrop of pulsating, banal, relentless electronica. But there are no alternate realities or subversions to the way he conducts his life, no hidden depths to be uncovered if you're patient enough, no way out of his bleak way of being. His bitterness, resentment, and rage are totally authentic, but they have no context. They are what they are. A similar dynamic is at play in "The Last of Us," which I've seen in three different forms: an extended demo, an episode of a game-centric podcast, and a two-hour-long movie clip that plays out on the PlayStation home screen. In all three versions, I loved it. It's a heady and violent ballet of sound and images, marked by moments of heartbreakingly human that leave you torn in two: with the player as a little boy caught in a tiny ghetto basement; with a mother desperate to get her children to safety, as bullets rip through the air, and then over her corpse; with a teenage boy watching as his best friend is murdered by a monster he'd been lured into hunting. The film clip heaps on enough horror and pathos to sustain an entire film in one continuous take; the game shows you the same events, over and over again, in a kind of reverse
