The reported two-phase deal that saw the South Korean government take a majority stake in Vuseon of less than 8 percent and MediaTek take another 11 percent of the company is still good, the company's chief executive, Minh Tran said in a recent Reuters interview. Vuseon is the parent company of Mediatek, which is the world's second-largest mobile chipset vendor. The deal includes an option for a final in-principle agreement between the two parties. "The best possible acquisition is [to] acquire the entire company at this time," Tran told Reuters. "But according to our partnership, we would not have invested all these money on infrastructure. So, we can choose either buy the whole company or sell our stake at an advantageous time." While most industry watchers expect the two chipmakers to reach an agreement, once inked, the timing of the deal is somewhat unclear. Many believe the merger is not the best thing for the two companies. During the past few months, the two companies have fought over market share and competitive pricing in third-party GPU sales. The primary battle came as the two companies shared Google's voluntary effort for the Android Open Source Project. As the settlement proved, Tran and MediaTek's representatives were at odds with Google and Intel. In February, the two companies fought over screen share for mobile phones — including tablets — as part of the Android mobile operating system. In a piece published in Forbes magazine, author Brian X. Chen cited statistics to show that in the first guarter of 2012 alone, both companies c6a93da74d
