although the information and tabular materials provided herein are for the purposes of explanation and definition, they are intended to serve also as a reference for approximate values for soil properties and other soil descriptions. as information is added to the database, it will be incorporated into these materials, and where necessary, corrections will be made. the table of definitions and classification criteria in key to my soil is the only reference that should be consulted for precise values for soil properties and related features. intended for use in helping to describe and compare soils, each part of a set of tabular materials is accompanied by short text descriptions and explanatory notes. the sets are arranged by geographical area and by the type of soil as expressed by the united states system of soil classification. the soils included are all natural soils, including those formed by pedogenesis. the note to editor notes for each part of each set are divided into two parts. the physically bulked subzone has undergone a change in bulk density of structural units that results in reduced continuity, reduced structural integrity, and less compact bulk. the physical characteristics of the structuring agents continue to dominate the structure (they are not dry-blown away), and the soil material may have a continuous thickness greater than 5 cm. the physically bulked subzone is depicted in figure 3-5 as the first layer in profile b and the third layer in profile e. the physiologically bulked subzone has undergone a change in bulk density of structural units that results in reduced continuity and less compact bulk. the soil material, however, is usually void of structural agents and may occur throughout the profile. the physiologically bulked subzone is depicted in figure 3-5 as the second layer in profile e.
