In Houdini's case, the magician is the wrong person to be the skeptic because he's a believer. And as a believer he remains caught in a very old and very deep prejudice against the idea that humans could be responsible for their own deaths. And in the face of that prejudice he finds it a lot easier to believe in the idea of vampirism. This movie was a professional magician who, after years of working in retail, found himself broke and took an entry-level job as an electronics technician at a 24-hour video store. He found that much of what he learned in school about electronics was useful, and thus enrolled in a trade school. After completing the course he was hired by a local cable company, where his duties included service calls, troubleshooting, assisting with building out cable systems, and troubleshooting customer's problems. If the customer was a magician, then Houdini would often repair their gear by using items obtained from a nearby magician shop, gaining experience and knowledge of the craft, including working with magic props. However, Houdini also proved adept in reading customers and coaxing information from them. As he learned more about the use of mind over body routines, he developed the ability to use magic to help people with their problems and gave free performances for free. When you are a professional magician, you have a lot more fun playing with numbers than you do with people. It's much easier. Most of them can't believe how what they learn from tables and figures is being applied to the real world. This is just the tip of the iceberg of what a magician can teach the layperson. If you are a magician, then my job is to help you do what you do better and more believably. If I were you, I'd put a little more focus on your trade's philosophy and less on your belief that it's okay to trick people. You'll be happier and more successful in your career if you do that. 5ec8ef588b
