While social research may not be considered to be the most rigorous form of research, it is an important part of the social sciences and often leads to new insights into how social structures and institutions operate. research on management in social science is typically done through field research, and there are a number of different approaches to this type of research. some approaches to field research are hypothesis driven, while others are less so. among the challenges of mixed methods design are the amount of data that need to be collected, the time needed to collect, analyse and report those data, and the potential for misinterpretation of the results as a result of not considering all types of data and information [ 24 ] qualitative methods of data collection are diverse and can vary in complexity, from interviews, video taped or audio recorded observations to focus groups, observations or online questionnaires. however, the focus of qualitative research is to generate empirical data, rather than simply make generalisations or interpretations about a particular phenomenon [ 22 ] the main types of qualitative research are interview studies, focus groups, observation and feedback. qualitative research methods typically involve the collection of data from a relatively small sample of people, who are selected in order to cover a diversity of backgrounds and experiences. the aim is to get an in-depth understanding of a particular topic or context. while the number of participants varies from qualitative research, typically the sample size is small, with the focus being on in-depth understanding of a particular phenomenon or issue. in quantitative research, focus is often on generalisation. the number of participants can vary. in a randomised controlled trial (RCT), for example, the sample size is typically large, and focus is on the statistical significance of the results.
