Insulin-secreting cells among endocrine cells of the stomach of the lizard, Sauromalus aegyptiacus. Sauromalus aegyptiacus, a lizard from the Arabian deserts, is characterized by high levels of circulating insulin. The distribution of insulin-secreting endocrine cells in its stomach was examined by immunocytochemical and ultrastructural techniques. Immunocytochemical analysis revealed that somatostatin-, glucagon-, and pancreatic polypeptide-containing endocrine cells were distributed throughout the entire stomach. Most glucagon- and pancreatic polypeptide-containing endocrine cells were located close to one another in particular groups, while somatostatin-containing cells were more scattered. Insulin-immunoreactive cells were detected in the entire stomach, mainly in the submucosa. Only a few of these cells were connected to the other endocrine cells in the layers of mucosa and muscularis. In addition, one cluster of insulin-immunoreactive cells was found in the myenteric plexus. Ultrastructural analysis revealed that the endocrine cells of this species were characterized by a highly developed Golgi complex and a well-developed type of beta-granules. The size and density of the type of beta-granules differed between the islets of enteroendocrine cells. Accordingly, they were classified into two groups: large and small beta-granules. The majority of insulin-secreting endocrine cells (41.2%) were connected to large beta-granules, and 38.7% of the endocrine cells contained both large and small beta-granules.
