As we reported yesterday, Warner's decision marks the first time a member of the Democratic party has officially announced their intentions to retire from public office. This means the long-term viability of the 'blue wave' that has been predicted for November is at risk, as Warner's absence could lead to a Senate split between the Democratic and Republican parties, leaving President Trump in a position to effectively appoint his own judges to the Supreme Court and fill out the rest of his cabinet. Although Warner is giving up his seat in the Senate, he will be staying on the committee of the powerful Senate Intelligence Committee. Just announced that I will be giving up my seat on the Senate Intel Committee to spend more time with my family and to help @JamesSteen in Virginia. I'll be there for the Blue Wave & will be a major force against Trump and his efforts to subvert the Constitution. — Mark Warner (@MarkWarner) October 17, 2018 As Democratic Senator from Virginia, Warner served as the vice chair of the Senate Intelligence Committee, and was also a member of the Senate Judiciary, Appropriations, Rules, and Budget committees.
