The advancements in the iPad's CPU and the latest GPU couldn't come along at a better time. I've spent plenty of time in Photoshop on my MacBook, and even on an older version of Photoshop, and I've become very used to its keyboard shortcuts. I still text my articles out on my MacBook and am happy with that, but I do find I'm more comfortable with the iPad. Photoshop has always impressed me with its fluidity and a great range of tools. That hasn't changed with the update, either. As well as making great-looking videos, Photoshop CC makes it easy to create your own. By clicking the words "Create your first video" above the screen, you'll be taken to the video editor. The editor feels like the full version, as it switches to the big video window. You can start with a simple movie and add all of the elements you need to create a professional-looking video. The style you choose in the Choose Format pop up gives a good overview of what you can do, so it's easy to set up the video style you want. Then, to add an image, you can select an existing image in PhotoShop, select Create a photo from scratch, and drag images onto the previewed elements. The recent version of Photoshop is the more user-friendly of the two applications. Its potential for greater use on smaller mobile screens has been greatly improved. Everything is so much more intuitive on the screen. I like how you can easily open your photo library right from the desktop, as well as from within other tools.

Think of completing objectives like Territory Management. In terms of a brand there are different objectives, such as creating awareness, generating a response, or increasing lifetime value. We'll talk about how each of those objectives come into play. The takeaway is simple; they all start the same. I'm happy to make a list of objectives if you'd like, but it really doesn't matter.
