BOTTOM: The all-you-can-eat filter range. Adobe is working on a manual thumbwheel to flip through it. Manual filtering is a great improvement from what we had: filters were either too many and non-grippy or too few and too expensive. The Wacom-based Apple Pencil is a cable-less stylus, meant for drawing and creating, as well as multi-touch input. It has a nice feel and feel-good weight. The Pencil's directional buttons work like any other mouse's: touch the surface with the tip and the downward or upward movement is registered. On the left side of the Pencil there's a "Magic Tray" button. This turns the surface on its side so that you can more easily work on the grid display and layer hierarchy. The Pencil tones down iPad gestures a little, according to Adobe blogger Patrick Ko. I've been using Lightroom since version 1.0 and just upgraded to LR5.2

(<http://www.adobe.com/products/photoshop/lightroom.html>). The experience is similar to what I'd expect for the learning curve, but faster than 4.0. More features in the release, including those for masking and smart previews, and overall performance has been enhanced. It's similar to what I'd expect between versions 4 and 5.

I'd say the new UI is similar to the current version without some of the newer elements included in the more recent versions. Still great for novice users. So I have Lightroom 5.1 and 5.2 both installed at the same time on my computer. Because Lightroom 5.2 is under "beta" status, until the final version is released I am not sure whether I should keep 5.1 or move to 5.2. That said, having the beta version available to me gives me the opportunity to compare the two and see if there are any differences to the program.
