This means that once you create everything, you need to make sure the document is flattened. This is because if you're editing something like a photo, you need to be able to change the effects of everything else in the image; if you try to skip this step, you can cause havoc trying to undo things later. Elements also uses a standard color management system, which controls subtle color changes in the scene and how it looks up and down the color wheel. Elements is robust but can be fiddly.
