Colloidal quantum dots (QDs) have shown great promise in next-generation optoelectronic and photonic devices. The assembly of these nanocrystals into defect-free films is, however, a formidable challenge, which limits their long-term stability. Here, we describe the development of a new method for fabricating scalable QD films that combines the advantages of the large surface area of colloidal nanocrystals and the high electrical conductivity of silicon. By a simple one-step process using polystyrene, the nanocrystals and silicon sources can be intimately mixed to form a defect-free amorphous QD/SiO₂ hybrid structure. The unique interaction between QDs and silicon increases the film conductivity and enables the growth of high-quality QD films. We present a detailed study of the photoluminescence (PL) of the QD films as a function of both the silicon content and excitation power. These films show significantly increased PL quantum yield compared to silica-coated QDs as the QD content in the film increases. The present invention relates to a cyclic redundancy check (CRC) circuit and, more particularly, to a CRC circuit for use in an engine controller of a vehicle to reduce power consumption. f988f36e3a
