I have used it for several years and I love it. It is easy to use and intuitive which is a very important trait in a photo editing program like this. Both the standard and professional versions are available and are priced the same. You may want to look at the other tiers of Elements if you decide to take the plunge, lightroom is expensive. Hi there. I've been using Lightroom for over a year now and have put tens of thousands of images in Lightroom galleries and be able to visually search for images that look interesting and then have my photographer drag/drop the images directly into the story. The dynamic screenshot of Lightroom that shows the image being imported is fantastic and sets my mind at ease before I've even begun processing an image. It gives me an idea of what the photo will look like in my art gallery. The uncluttered interface in the canvas allows me to get on with editing. Because Lightroom gallery exports iPhoto photo albums, the images are a breeze to move to Photoshop and then to Powerpoint and other programs. I have seen the Lightroom development team add in additional features every time I've updated the program and the conversion of search icons for various Lightroom features (autofocus, grid, etc) to those in the latest Lightroom version is seamless. Features have always been forthcoming as a result of the user community feedback. At the time of this writing, Lightroom is selling at Mac & PC galleries for $69.95. What's not to love about that price?

This is a great value considering the second option is $20.99/mo for use of only Photoshop.
