Having said all this, I did have a chance to look at my initial test file and did some tests comparing PS+LR's updates to a typical PSD update using Photoshop Export Utility used in conjunction with Adobe's Importer module. I found that Photoshop's importation is more streamlined, and the Photoshop update was relatively quick as compared to the LR update. So, while this test was not planned from the onset, I don't think Lightroom's recent implementation of exporting to PSD has made much of an improvement in speed. This is important for those shooting a lot of photos, and perhaps Photoshop should have this compact export feature from the beginning. But I do believe that a thorough manual, or perhaps even a tool exists that tells you why Photoshop makes certain decisions about how to update a file. When exporting PSDs, Photoshop makes assumptions, which, in my mind, slows down the process. For example, if you take an image from your library and click on the Export as PSD in Photoshop CS6, you may be surprised to see that the PSD is saved with the name of the image from which it was copied (rather than the name of your Photoshop file). My suggestion is that the name of the image (the PSD) should be used, and an explanation for that at the end of the file, so that you could then import into any other application that can open PSDs and just create a new document based on the image in your library (and not on an image you exported from your PSD).

Sure, this trick works with most image editors, but I don't think it is necessary to rely on this trick to import PSDs.
