Introducing Divvy. Divvy is a powerful window management solution for both Mac OS X and Microsoft Windows that allows you to quickly and efficiently "divvy up" your screen into exact portions. Divvy's segmented interface makes it easier than ever to organize your windows and maximize screen real estate. Download Divvy 1.4.4.293 (Window Management) - SeuPirate.rar

Top 5 best CSS3 properties to create custom form fields CSS3 allows you to do a lot of things with it's properties and the best way to get into form design is by using CSS3 property to design a form field. CSS3 is everywhere and there are a lot of awesome things to do with it. In the last couple of weeks I have made a post about where to start with CSS3 form field designs and today I am back to tell you how to use CSS3 properties to make custom form fields. I will be starting from "Top 5 best CSS3 properties to create custom form fields". Now let's have a look on the best CSS3 properties to create custom form fields.

1. Flexible Box Layout CSS3 allows to create some layouts using the flexbox model. Now this isn't really a property which you would use to create a form field. But if you know how to use it in other ways than on a form, you can easily create your own layout. To give you an example, I have created a simple HTML code and CSS code for a dropdown menu using Flexbox. The main benefit of Flexbox is to do grid-like layouts with your website and here is how it works. Two boxes are added to the body. The one on the left is the flex-start box, where the item with the "red" class will fill the whole height of the box. The one on the right is the flex-end box where the item with the "green" class will fill the whole width of the box.

.flexbox { display: flex; flex-wrap: wrap; flex-direction: row; } .flexbox div { width: 50px; height: 50px; background-color: red; } The flex-end item will be aligned to the right side of the flex-start box because of
