its place. To work, it needs to be cheap, simple, scalable and easy to measure. You can see this in the paltry amounts of money pumped into climate policy research and development, and in the funding for clean energy technology research and development. To be scalable and easy to measure, you also need to know how much the climate will change. Until recently, climate science's measurement systems have been weak. But they have now been strengthened by an international group of researchers who have outlined a new approach to measuring the climate. The new system is called “Earth System Scenario Testing” (ESS). It is being built by the international community through a series of workshops to develop and test its key technical and scientific requirements. It is a dynamic, constantly evolving process, but the initial draft plan is now complete. The ESS is based on an important science-based paper that was published in the journal Earth Systems Dynamics in July. It is called “Measuring past and future climate states” (MSC). f988f36e3a
