The prior version of Lightroom was released in July 2012. However, it didn't appear to warrant a deep review as it was functionally the same as the previous version. The new version doesn't serve that purpose. It's a huge step forward and I was excited to see what Lightroom had to offer. Photoshop hasn't changed that much. However, it is now faster than ever. New features include Instagram-style cropping, improved support for Fuji X-T2, RAW and other formats, and Lens Correction. The big feature is that Photoshop now supports the DNG format for Canon 7D. This means you can open a DNG on a computer and have it open in Photoshop as well as ACR. DNGs are intended to replace all Canon Digital Photo Professional (DPP) products. Adobe also added a darker and more natural Look Color to the automatic skin-tone adjustment. Also, the Lookup feature in the panel has been improved along with a new Quick Looks app. They're not the most impressive light tools, but they will be useful in a darkroom. Included is a mysterious new feature called Adjust Skin Tone that lets you choose between pushing or pulling skin tones for looking more pale or dark. It's a good learning feature that I haven't explored much. I also took a look at the new Design feature. It's not meant for creating a print design especially, but for creating a more pleasing environment for your headshots. It has an automatic based style that creates a background and headshape from your portrait image. A simple adjustment of color and sharpness are included. However, if you want more control, you can import and edit the new Perspective grid. I'm not crazy about the look, but it's a small step in the right direction.
