Pentax is deep into a renaissance for its camera lineup. After the D-FA series was first introduced in 2014, the company has introduced a total of three DSLRs. The super-fast K-5 II has been replaced by a higher-priced full-frame DSLR, the 645Z, and an interesting APS-C enthusiast model, the 650D. Along with these new models, the company has announced the replacement of its latest model in its consumer imaging line, the K-5. The D-FA 100 boasts a full-frame 24-megapixel sensor and features a handful of no-compromise features like a supportable tilting LCD tilting mechanism and ample resolution in the form of its supposed 100 percent viewfinder. Pentax follows this up with its latest enthusiast DSLR, the 500mm f/6.3 WR APSC lens. Like its sensor partner with its D-FA series, the 300mm replaces the middle-of-range A2 model in the middle of the chain. The new 500 mm f/6.3 WR will be the first full-frame Pentax prime with WR (wide-range), which means it offers an extremely wide maximum aperture of f/6.3. Moreover, the WR objective lens design is composed of two glass elements, one circular and one aspherical, to provide maximum light transmission and distortion correction. While the new sharing features are welcome, other changes are far more important to me. Besides sharing scanning setups, comments, and supporting Tools, some of the top issues have to do with Lightroom. First, there is a limit of 64 image names per project in the Lightroom 5 version. At a minimum, you want to be able to store images with meaningful names. I try to be very careful about that. You can overwrite a 64 names per project limit with a single picture name, but it's certainly inconvenient and leads to confusion. Second, Lightroom 5 has a problem saving image files to the hard drive in any case. You can't drag & drop files to get your backup to the drive. Files don't automatically open when dragged & dropped. It's not as compact as this title and it's certainly not intuitive.

Available starting today on the Mac App Store, Share for Review (beta) goes beyond traditional team sharing by dynamically creating and managing dynamic groups of collaborators based on the size, color space and content of your assets. Users can directly edit assets in a collaborative Photoshop file and co-edit assets with each other in real time, all without leaving the same Photoshop file. In addition to real-time collaboration, Share for Review beta offers powerful visual collaboration features, including annotation tracking, style UI, and a content aware fill tool. Sharing assets to a collaborative online project is easily possible directly from the Share for Review UI, with simultaneous updates to collaborators in the same Photoshop file reflected in the use of the new collaborative editing features, along with a live "push" capability to update collaborators on content-aware fills. Versions of Photoshop on the Mac App Store will initially be the full Photoshop CC application which includes all the added capabilities above. Adobe plans to launch a new, simpler Share for Review application on Android and iOS later in 2020. The flagship desktop Photoshop CC application continues to enhance the editing experience with the release of @your command, a one-click, command available on the new Fill & Adjust menu tab in the top bar. Using this easy-to-use tool, users can apply the same action throughout the file with a single action without having to make individual actions. With the new one-click Delete and Fill tool, users can easily remove and replace objects using a simple one-click action without having to delete manually and select the objects to replace.
