CS5 will soon be the native 32-bit version for the best platform, Windows 8. This would mean that Adobe has ported to x86 instead of continuing to support both 32-bit and 64-bit Architectures. This alone will not bring forward the CS6 versions of the software. In fact, they will be even further ahead than they already are. After all, I am not just any user. I am the editor of iPhoneLife and I live and breathe this software. And in fact, I am the one paying Apple for the privilege to develop software for their platform. But that means the customer is also paying me, albeit indirectly. Which is why I chose to ask my subscribers for their feedback. IPower is one of my most popular podcasts and is a pure gold mine of knowledge. I don't just tell my subscribers what is new, because they already know about the latest iPhone, iPad, OS features and improvements. For example, I have written about the updated MacBook Pro for the past few weeks on the podcast. But what I am looking for is:
