I have a C#.Net app that occasionally (sometimes every few hours, sometimes only once or twice a day) experiences sudden spikes in disk activity. A first pass analysis suggests that the regularity of these spikes suggests they are related to specific events occurring in the application, but I don't know whether that is the case. The program is very susceptible to these spikes, sometimes, of periods of up to 4 hours or more, of extremely high disk utilization. If I understand correctly, these spikes must have something to do with my app, because if I stop the app, these patterns cease. Any ideas on how to investigate further? A: You could look for indexing spiking when the database is flushed or other back-end operations occur? Q: Importing to bokeh raises ImportError: No module named `views` I am trying to import my models from models.py to views.py. I tried running python manage.py runserver &, but that gives the following error: ImportError: No module named views My models.py: from apps.users.models import User, Groups from apps.blogs.models import Blog from apps.blog_comments.models import BlogComment from apps.datashe
