Today has been a unique day for me. After suffering with camera problems early in the day, I got up and took a few fun photos. A few minutes later, my AirPods began to autoplay a podcast using the AirPods Pro feature, which silently plays an audio podcast in the background. It's taken me some time to figure out how to mute it. I've learned to simply tap the "mute" button on the AirPods Pro headphones themselves. To my knowledge, I've never had any issues with it. AirPods Pro is still my favorite closed-ear wireless headphones, as far as comfort, sound quality and battery life. As a photographer, I often wonder what my image might look like if I did an adjustment here or there. Most of the time, I don't think that I would changed every single individual color. And besides, if I don't think a particular image is quite right, there are many methods I could use to finish it off, out of the box, on the computer. I could, for instance, use the Photoshop , Photoshop Lightroom or Photoshop CS6 to create an adjustment in the correct file format, which I could then move to an external storage device or printer, confident that I had a high level of color accuracy. The point is that these are all methods that I could do to make image adjustments with Photoshop, myself, without having to pay another artist to alter my images, spend overtime, or subject myself to extensive trial and error. Creating such a software tool could revolutionize the way that photography is performed, today—and for the foreseeable future. And if you found that the first offering for creating such a tool didn't quite work, the second version might have fewer glitches.
