My initial impression was that the Fine Hdr did much of what the Auto-Hdr did and with more effective control. At times, however, the Fine Hdr seemed to struggle to save picks, even after my changes seemed to cure the problem. I shouldn't be surprised by such behavior considering the price – the Fine Hdr retails for $69 right now, while Auto-Hdr is $29, and Auto-Hdr Fine is $49. The Fine Hdr does have a more extensive library of reference images and exposure ranges which can help in these calculations (if you've got the technical background). Adobe indicates that Fine Hdr has a number of issues that have yet to be ironed out. Personally, I haven't found a lot of them, but I've made edits that I feel should be easier for Fine Hdr to handle. Too bad Fine Hdr still doesn't seem to work out of the box on some of the newer and more expensive cameras. Is This a Good Camera? While the basics of evaluating exposure in the camera's native raw converter are pretty self-evident (reducing shutter speed, increasing ISO, and selecting M mode), there's a bit of a gotcha with the print settings that make me think bare-bones is the way to go. Since I have no interest in printing after this review, I've shoved that issue aside. What I've been concentrating on is how to best expose digital negatives. Thankfully, this isn't very difficult. It will also give me some new practice with better exposure. As you should already know, Adobe recognizes your friends on Facebook. So it's no shock that some silly company in California has to suss out your friends now too. Facebook tells them, and their creepy friends tell them. I don't know why Facebook spies and shares for their profit. They're doing a whole new kind of social surveillance.
