Adobe offers tools and plug-ins to access anything your computer can access—whether it's hosted on the Internet or on your desktop. These tools and plug-ins let you do everything from the basic mail checking to the more involving e-mail sending and receiving. Adobe has done a great job of adding new capabilities to Photoshop. These enhancements are interesting and beneficial, yet they do not come across as shiny and new. To illustrate, Photoshop 5 started off with the Photoshop Editor that took up most of the screen and you couldn't easily see any of the rest of the application. Although the plug-ins for better image import are useful, the interface is a lot slower. I would have expected at least the basic image import to be faster since we all know Lightroom 4 does it best. It just turns out to be a performance issue on my test machine, or on others'. Then, with the CS5 release, the transition to a tablet-based design interface was awkward and you could see that the original design was being tossed aside. Luckily, new performance for the application can be found by simply going back to the tool set and improving image quality. Adobe provided a demo version of its Creative Suite for Windows, beginning with Creative Suite 5, which I freely admit is a bit intimidating to other photographers from a technical standpoint. But if you ask me, this is a bit like buying a used car. You're initially nervous about it but after you get it home and have some time to play with it, you realize you wouldn't live without it. If you change the locks and flip the engine, paint it coffee color and tear the seat up a bit, you immediately enhance the value of your investment.

When you upgrade Lightroom you get Photoshop added to your subscription. You can even enhance the colors. With Lightroom you can apply various adjustments and blend images. You can do selective color edits and adjustments and apply them to areas. You can even create your own custom profiles. Some of the applications are pretty similar. Most of their tools are similar. However, Photoshop has more professional users. They prefer the tools available in Photoshop. Because they are DTP tools, it's what Photoshop does.
