In terms of user interface - I wonder if the designers had actually used the application for any length of time in the past? I'm not so sure about considering a cosmetic feature such as changing the way scrollbars behave, or the way fly-out menus work in the version of Photoshop you see on this page. I know for a fact that I spent a lot of time refactoring my panel layouts to suit the design of Photoshop in previous releases. As a long-time user these do seem like basic things which should be included in, and as an interface expert I would love to see greater consistency for features which should be standardised among all versions of Photoshop (and other professional software, such as Bridge). This was a real pain when my panel layout changed in one version of my software (Pixelmator) which I had to re-invent, and it wasn't until later that I discovered that in Photoshop the behaviour of the panels was the new way. There are also a number of features which used to be really inconsistent but now are consistent across the entire system. There are a lot of new features which I am yet to dig out of the depths of the help files, and I've barely skimmed the surface of what has been added. But where I have seen the new features which existed previously now in place, I can't say how much I like them. There are also a lot of improvements which don't spring out at first glance. The validation and smart views (see below) need some more time to be explored for me, as do the panorama tools (like I already mentioned). As for the features which I did use - for the first time they seem to be well thought through and are intelligently implemented.
